

January 2019 Update

February 1st, 2019

In the News

As 2018 came to a close, there were plenty of predictions for the consumer financial services industry for the new year.

Compli published Michael Benoit and Eric Johnson's predictions for the auto industry on their blog. Both Michael and Eric agreed that Kathy Kraninger, the new CFPB director, will likely be a more aggressive director than the industry would like.

Eric and Tom Hudson also discussed several regulatory trends they advised could be coming in 2019 in the January issue of RV News. The Consumer Financial Protection Bureau (CFPB), under new director Kathy Kraninger, could write fewer rules, continue to handle issues in the supervision process but not in enforcement, and extend ongoing emphasis on dealer add-on products. Eric and Tom also expect to see more compliance sweeps and enforcement activity from the Federal Trade Commission on dealer print, TV, radio and YouTube ads that use “mouse type” disclosures.

Catherine Brennan provided alternative finance predictions for deBanked. “We will likely continue to see state efforts to enact disclosures in MCA and small business lending transactions. We will also likely see efforts at the state level to ban practices viewed as aggressive by elected officials.” She also outlined merchant cash advance insights for an article in MagnifyMoney on January 17.

Hudson Cook attorneys also took a look back at 2018 trends and regulations. Tom Hudson provided a scorecard on the 2018 predictions from Patty Covington, Eric Johnson and Nikki Munro in his article for Auto Dealer Today. Nikki summarized the CFPB’s Summer 2018 Supervisory Highlights in the January/February issue of SubPrime magazine.
